B.C.'s NDP government is well aware of the possibility that big-time drug dealers could be buying pot in Canada from China and other international markets. A high-ranking official with the province's public-safety ministry told a Vancouver-based legislative committee Thursday that the concern about where cannabis is grown is part of the reason British Columbia's government has put restrictions on the industry. B.C. Attorney General David Eby told the committee in Vancouver that he could not say for sure whether violent and dangerous drug traffickers are obtaining weed from overseas. But he said the government is concerned that could happen. "We're very concerned that the importation of illegal drugs to B.C. could be coming from overseas," Eby said, noting that cannabis from Colombia, Mexico and Morocco has been seized along the B.C. border and on Canadian soil. "So we take very seriously the risks that cross-border drug trafficking poses to our communities." The challenge for B.C. is to balance Ottawa's needs and the question of where the legal marijuana is being produced, Eby told the committee. The government has said one of its priorities is protecting the illegal drug market from the legitimate cannabis industry, which the government believes is expanding too rapidly, with stocks for recreational users threatening to disrupt the black market. The committee, which is holding hearings on B.C.'s legal marijuana business, allowed private companies to submit written questions. The province announced in February that it would require Health Canada to approve any pot producer that wanted to sell cannabis in the B.C. Liquor Distribution Branch system, through its existing 47 stores. The B.C. NDP government is proposing a new model for pot distribution similar to that of wine, beer and spirits.
